Excerpt from The Canadian Miller and Grain Trade Review, 1892, Vol. 10 HE proper care of loose pulleys and idlers is a very important consideration in a large wood-working mill or factory where there is a large amount of oil and babbitt metal used to keep up these parts of the running gear of the mill; that is, to keep them in good condition. What is more disagreeable than to go into a mill and hear one or two loose pulleys rattling and jarring away at a fearful rate and doing great damage to the shaft, which in the end will be cut up and worn so badly that the shaft has to be taken to the machine shop and trued up. This can be done once or twice, and then the shaft is too small for further use unless the worn piece is cut off and a new piece welded on and trued up. I have often seen this done on account of the shaft being so badly cut up; the only resort was to weld a piece on and true up. I have seen pulleys reversed; that is, the tight changed over to the other side of the loose pulley on account of the Shaft being so worn.
